The dust bowl was a famous drought that happened in the 1930s. The drought was very big because it was from Texas reaching to Nebraska! It played a part in the great depression because of all the crops and the wind it played a part in the great depression.

The Dust Bowl, also known as “the Dirty Thirties,” started in 1930 and lasted for about a decade, but its long-term economic impacts on the region lingered much longer.

The dust bowl happened because of a couple reasons some including very bad weather, farming economics and other cultural factors.

By 1934, an estimated 35 million acres of land had been made useless for farming, while another 125 million acres an area roughly three-quarters the size of Texas! Was rapidly losing its best soil.
